The 2016 Oslo Architecture Triennale, After Belonging, designs the objects, spaces and territories for a transforming condition of belonging under global regimes of circulation. The triennale examines both our attachment to places and collectivities – where do we belong? – as well as our relation to the objects we own, share, and exchange – how do we manage our belongings?

For the first public presentation of the Triennale in London, After Belonging invites a group of architects and spatial practitioners to reflect on one of the proposals selected through an International Call for Intervention Strategies: ‘Nature, Labour, Land: A Public Spatial Archive for Kirkenes’ seeks to produce a forum to discuss the construction of a new eco-political Arctic governance by operating on three negotiations in the region: the melting of the Arctic ice (Nature), the expected global shipment along the Northeast Passage (Labour) and the indigenous conception of the territory (Land). Participants will consider the intersection of non-human nature, indigenous rights and transnational labour.
